

Workshops for Educators: Preventing and Addressing Body-Based Bullying

One in seven Canadian teens, and 40% of 11 and 12 year olds, are teased about their appearance, making body-based bullying the most common form of bullying in today's schools. It is crucial to effectively address body-based bullying as it can contribute to the development of eating disorders, which have the highest mortality rate of any mental illness.

We recognize that educators have an immense impact and have a great potential to influence their students. Our goal is to provide educators with the tools to offer support to students, the information to make the best referral should that be required, and to assist in fostering a school culture that celebrates natural physical diversity. We deliver tailored presentations, providing educators with:

- An introduction to eating disorders and their warning signs;
- A look at eating disorder risk factors from a bio-psycho-social perspective;
- An introduction to eating disorder prevention;
- Hands-on strategies for addressing body image issues and building critical media literacy with young people;
- Tools and resources for addressing and preventing body-based bullying;
- Resources for helping students who may currently be experiencing food and weight preoccupation or an eating disorder.

About us

The National Eating Disorder Information Centre (NEDIC) is a non-profit organization founded in 1985 to provide information and resources on eating disorders and food and weight preoccupation.
